

Front Cover

The image shows newly-emerged juveniles of the brown widow spider, Latrodectus geometricus. In our study, we found that invasive brown widow spiderlings disperse aerially under an unusually broad range of conditions, including wind speed, temperature, humidity, and time of day. This increased propensity and ability to disperse may partially explain the species' global invasive spread. Photo credits: Alfred Daniel J.

